IN A STARLING FIND...

In a startling find, the heritage of Viscount Charles Augustus Aldworth has come into question due to a series of letters from his mother to a childhood friend. Although he died centuries ago, the revelations are sure to rock his descendants.

Due to her husband's penchant for young males she write detailing how she came to take a series of lovers to provide her with satisfaction she craved. Starting off by approaching gypsy tinkers in the verge, she took to using the servants while her husband left on his ever increasing hunting trips with his males. Indeed, the night she believes she conceived, he was 100 miles away as she partook of 2 of the servants, an Indian and an African, along with a local peasant and her favourite gypsy, whom she had got a job as a stable-hand. With the cocktail of juices involved in the conception, it is impossible to tell what his real heritage was, but truly, the viscount was a child of the empire.

CCTV CAMERAS ESSENTIAL IN SOLVING MURDER

Some people see them as a necessary evil, while others see them as just the next step on the way to a "Big Brother State." However, the CCTV evidence presented in the Eddie McVitie murder provided crucial evidence to the police that led to the eventual capture and conviction of John McNulty. The footage that caught McNulty running from the scene with the weapon in hand was taken from one of the many cameras operated by security firm Glasgow O.

Since the introduction of CCTV cameras in the early 1990s' a recent study conducted by Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities, clearly shows the major impact that the cameras have in helping to stop and solve many crimes. The main report shows that while statistically crime has risen over the last ten years by as much as 20 – 25 percent, the rate of solved crime, involving the use of CCTV cameras has risen to between 38 and 47%. So in real terms according to the study the introduction of CCTV cameras throughout the city of Glasgow has significantly reduced the number of unsolved crimes.

The main reason for this rise in solved crimes are the state of the art digital cameras used by Glasgow O – the images are perfectly crystal clear – yet another benefit of the digital age. Gone are the days of grainy hard to see video footage where features were barely discernable. Most people hail this as a true miracle of the modern age.
